Promise or Compromise? Education for Young People in Secure Institutions in England

Caroline Lanskey

Institute of Criminology, University of Cambridge, UK, cml29@cam.ac.uk

Abstract

In the light of recent legislative changes, this article offers an exposition of key issues relating to the positioning of education for young people under 18 years in secure institutions in England. It argues that interpretations of education have become overly narrow in criminal justice policy and practice and that, while the new legislation offers potential for improvement, further consideration needs to be given to the impact of existing penal and reform agendas which currently limit the conceptual reach and delivery of education in secure institutions.

EDITORIAL POLICY

The primary purpose of the Journal of Composite Materials is to provide a permanent record of achievements in the science, technology, and economics of composite materials. Implicit in this objective is the recognition and appropriate publication of the accomplishments of all participating interests. Fulfillment of this purpose depends almost entirely upon the voluntary contribution of articulate, accurate, and authoritative manuscripts. In addition to the multiple reviewing of candidate manuscripts to assure high standards of technical veracity, editorial selectivity also involves consideration of the equitable coverage of the entire field. In further discharging its responsibilities, the journal endorses the content and programs of appropriate trade associations and professional societies, but asserts its independent role in both the recording and, if necessary, appraising of their activities.

provided on the website.
